Bryan, whose primary language is not English, struggled in high school. He would regularly leave school feeling frustrated and confused. On top of that, he lacked access to a home computer to get his work done.

One day, Bryan visited Project Access to get homework help. After learning someone was available to help him, he came to the center four times a week. He also appreciated having access to a computer.

Over time, Bryan’s grades improved and he has a more positive outlook on his education. He just enrolled in Project Access’ Juntos program which prepares young people for college. He is excited to continue to advance his education.
